

Satin Is Her First Choice

LITTLE-WAISTED . . . white satin bridal dress with the skirt puffed over the hips and fully trained.

The girl that he marries this spring or summer will, nine weddings out of ten, wear white satin. This is the news from famous designers of bridal dresses, who have a way of knowing that most brides-to-be feel they look most beautiful in traditional gleaming satin.

Featured is an example of the room type of dress preferred. It has this season's yards and yards of fabric, extended into a newly-wide train. Sleeves are quaintly puffed at the top and thin therefrom to the wrist. Narrow lace ruffling edges the heart-shaped neckline, filled in with marquisette, and is continued down the front of the basque bodice.

Something new for the bride who wears junior sizes is the wedding dress designed for her own particular measurements. A number of collections feature such dresses for the first time this season. Among the most appealing and newest is an ankle-length dress of white faille
